Tobacco control leaders were extremely proud of the movement's achievements in the state of Minnesota. In sharing their perspectives and experiences with Mark Wolfson, they found a way of making sure that the story would get told. His training in social movements had given him an appreciation of the importance of understanding the social infrastructure on which movements are built and Minnesota had built heavily on the infrastructure of health care and public health. About the Author: Mark Wolfson is an associate professor and director for community Research Department of Public Health Science, Wake Forest University School of Medicine. His research has been funded by both governmental and private research grants.
